Red Sea Diving Safari represents an international network of divers and eco-tourists, whom are committed to improving the environmental performance and overall competitiveness of the Egyptian tourism industry through environmentally responsible tourism practices. The team has spent the last 25 years building this model in collaboration with HEPCA, The Red Sea Protectorate, the Egyptian Chamber of Diving and Watersports, and many other organizations and individuals.

Their efforts encompass many initiatives such as raising awareness, applying environmentally responsible business practices, and funding/supporting environmental projects and collaborating on scientific studies and research."Our organization - it's written on their website - is spearheading a community based alliance, which has taken the initiative in managing our environmental challenges. The work being carried out is truly monumental and a testament to the commitment of the Marsa Alam and Red Sea community. Our most significant achievement in conservation of biodiversity has been our active involvement in the declaration of national parks and protectorates, which will ensure that these vital resources are recognized for their diversity and economic value; sites such as Shaab Sammadai (Dolphin House) home to over 100 spinner dolphins or Wadi El Gemal protectorate, which encompasses 80 km of coastline, islands, and desert. In a harsh region of dry desert and little fresh water resources, these precious eco-systems sustain marine life, terrestrial life, the Bedouins, and the tourism industry".
