TEDDY CRUZ. Guatemalan architect, works in the border area between San Diego and Tijuana, where some of the richest world's districts lives along with areas of real destruction. In this exchange, Cruz sees the emergence of new hybrid models in which suburban american life and Latino social heritage are melted together, and he designs prefabricated frames that can be used to support temporary homes in Tijuana. Cruz's work reinvent the role of the architect, mediating between entrepreneurs, authorities and citizens, experimenting with a new housing model with care for ecological issues, creation of new social possibilities, triggering off a process of a process of empowerment.
