The Internet is enabling new economic and political ideas, such as peer-to-peer and sharing economies, Direct Democracy and the Open Source movement. Increasingly, the Internet is used to organize and build protests and even political revolutions. And yet, for something so pregnant with possibilities for improving global justice, and for better distribution of power, ideas, knowledge, and means of production, it is ironically wholly owned by the corporatocracy. We need to fork the Internet and leave the old one to the corporations.
